Q: ReactJS - How to structure a page to be viewed by many people I am creating a masonry type image gallery that I want to be viewable by many people at the same time. Currently, on the sidebar there is a button with an onClick event. Every time someone clicks the button, the data from an external API is fetched and the data is placed in the DOM. I want to optimize this (because this is a large project and I don't want a bunch of data in the browser). The image gallery currently uses a structure with a large image, a paragraph box, and a button. The button is an anchor that opens an overlay div with the paragraph. This is the jQuery code: `$('a.right').click(function(e){ e.preventDefault(); // get the target var target = $(this).attr("href"); // close any open dialog '.gallery-overlay').children().hide(); // show the target modal '.gallery-modal').fadeIn(400); // get the data from the target $.ajax({ type: "GET", url: "/link/to/data.json", success: function(data){ // put the data into the target 'div.row'.html(data); } }); });` I have had issues implementing the DOM to this project because the images are dynamic and will all be different sizes. So when I am trying to implement this, I am getting errors because the HTML code is being placed into the DOM. So, I went back to basics, and tried to create a ReactJS component. The first step in this was to create a custom JSX component. I put a div on a component called Image, and placed the image and two props - src and alt. `class Image extends React.Component { render() { return (`

Q: invalid or corrupted Netscape-URL-attributes in IE9 after installing Google Chrome Frame I have two websites, one developed in ASP.Net and one in pure JS. I recently began to notice that in some browsers (IE9, IE10 and sometimes even Opera) users report that the page in IE looks broken because of the following attributes: ProductList
